

Teens emerged from Boise in late 2010. Practicing in a portioned off underground Cold War era bomb shelter outside of town, the band developed a sound that recalls mid-60's psychedelic garage rock reminiscent of The 13th Floor Elevators or The Animals, while expanding on the current popular wave of fuzzy, garage and low-fi sounds with their own unique interpretation.

Teens was recorded with a severe lack of professional equipment, in the same underground hole mentioned above. Only two microphones, severely cramped confines, archaic tracking devices, and a 'first-take-is usually-the-best-take' approach, all combine to give the album an effervescent charm that would be unrealized in more posh circumstances.

Teens is rapidly developing a reputation in Boise for their live shows. If you ask one of the band members, they'll try being humble about it and say something like, "we just go out there and play." As one band member described the motive, "a type of reaction against being bored and having to go to work or school everyday. It's an outlet or type of negative relief. A release."

Formed in Boise, Idaho at the tail end of 2010, Teens hone in on that great '66 sound, a time when the Animals and 13th Floor Elevators wrote surf-guitar rock in quick punches that were heavy with radio-friendly hooks.

"Just got this killer garage punk throwback in the inbox. Teens, a group of dudes from Boise, ID, got together last year to record their self-titled debut EP "with two microphones in a cold war era bomb shelter." Fans of The Animals and Operation Ivy will dig this shit hard."

FRESH FEATURE - TEENS

"Boise's Teens originated last year, perfecting their mid-60's psychedelic garage jams in an underground Cold War era bomb shelter outside of town. The four dudes live in the DIY mode, from recording their debut album in that same cramped basement with two microphones to crafting their own cassettes. The end result: a pure lo-fi sound that captures their rambunctious live show to a T."
